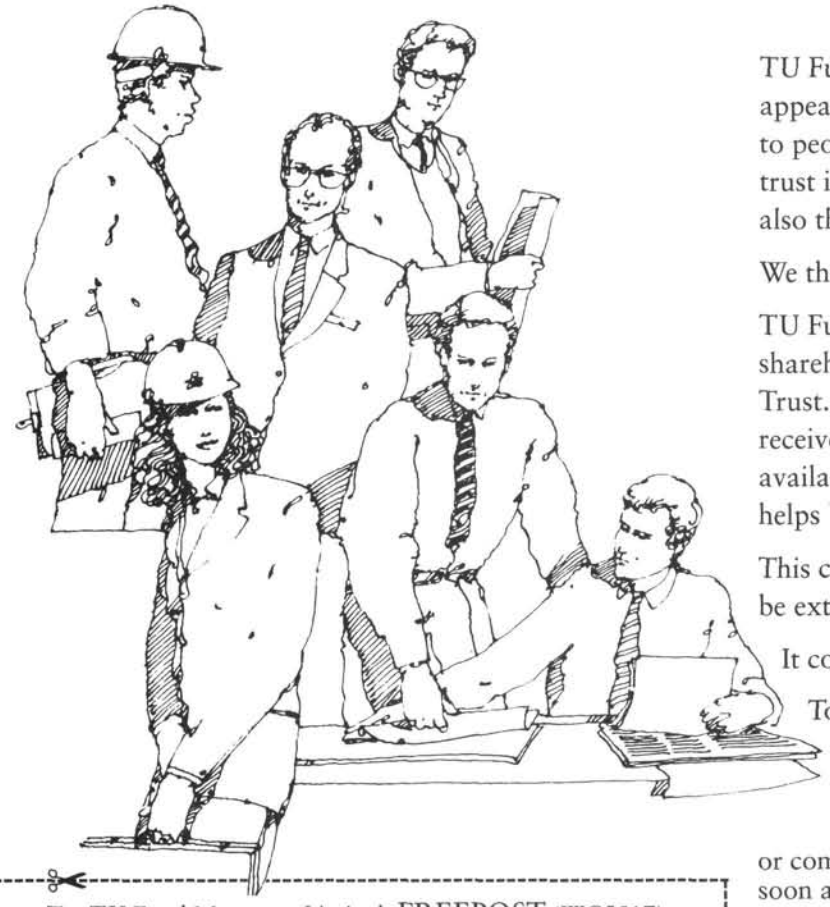
Managing to care...



TU Fund Managers Limited has a rather special appeal to investors. It is an approach that appeals to people who believe it is important for their unit trust investments to benefit not only themselves but also the less fortunate in society.

We think of it as the caring way to invest.

TU Fund Managers Limited has no individual shareholders; it is wholly owned by a Charitable Trust. This means that while you - the investor - receive investment profits, management profits are available to support charities so your investment helps both you and others less fortunate.

This considerate approach to investment is about to be extended across a wider financial community.

It could be applied to your portfolio.

John Monks, the next general secretary of the TUC, outlines his ideas about its future and that of trade unions in general

A change of mood is in the air

John Monks takes over from Norman Willis

I want the TUC to play a major part in the nation's affairs as they affect the world of work, economic development and social justice.

I want it to be widely respected and widely representative of working people. I want the TUC to be interesting and attractive—the kind of organisation people are proud to be part of, activists strike to work for, and government and important interest groups seek to meet and do business with.

I want to celebrate achievements and victories. I want trade unions to have heroes and heroines who can raise the morale and horizons of working people.

It is obvious that the TUC is some way from being in that position, and so we need to look at what stops us from getting from where we are to where we would like to be.

There is, of course, the external environment, with its potent mixture of government hostility and structural change in the economy, but there are other factors too.

First is our recent history. There are still potent folk memories at least in some influential circles—about union power defeating elected governments.

Our power in the 1970s was much exaggerated but, in many cases, the 1970s were not a period of failure. Inflation was brought down with what, in retrospect, was a very modest increase in unemployment. That was a victory. That was solidarity and it was an achievement for the TUC. Yet a different interpretation of that period remains powerful in the minds of politicians and opinion-formers. The 1970s are, in my view, due for rehabilitation and the sooner it happens the better for trade unions' public image.

Other historical features crowd in on us as well. We are expected by many activists to call for solidarity industrial action in major disputes, yet we know that, for a variety of reasons, of which the new legal constraints are but one, the conditions for effective action of this kind rarely occur.

While we have to be cautious, however, we must not be negative. The strong helping the weak, common action behind common causes—these are the fundamentals of trade unionism. And if we cannot deliver effective, relieving, rescuing, reinforcing forces for unions in difficulty in major disputes, we can promote solidarity and common action around causes between the high paid and low paid, between the employed and unemployed, between the sexes, between the races and so on. Respected trade union movements overseas see solidarity in this broader way, as well as helping unions in trouble. A further factor that dominates us is our closeness to Labour.

I don't detect the government or the CBI looking for deals, but it would do us no harm to suggest some

The TUC is not central to the current arguments about union-Labour links. More than half our unions are not affiliated to Labour, nor are we.

But, for the past 14 years or so, most of our eggs have been in the basket of a Labour victory and we have been constrained from building influence in other political groupings. Of course, this is mainly a realistic reflection of current government attitudes, but it is reinforced by our own tendencies. To take a symbolic example, we carry motions regularly that call futuristically for the next Labour government to do this or that, so giving the impression that all we can do is to wait and hope for a Labour victory. I don't detect the government or the CBI looking for deals, but it would do us no harm to put them on the spot by suggesting some. After all, individual unions do deals with employers all the time.

I believe that there is now a chance for us to break free from some of these constraints. A change of mood is in the air. I detect more and more concern among people about the issues that matter to unions—the way that employment prospects and conditions at work are worsening.

Opportunities are desperately few. Full-time ones are even fewer. Employers are switching to more casualised work patterns to avoid even our feeble framework of employment protection legislation. The death of the wages councils—abolished last week—will rot that feeble framework still further.

According to a recent poll, concerns about work now rank second only to violent crime in the lists of people's worries. There are opportunities to expose how unscrupulous employers are treating workers and undermining the other employers who want to observe decent standards.

There must be an increasingly receptive audience for our view that change comes best through security and partnership not through fear and coercion—not least because that is very much the approach of the best British employers and our neighbours in the European Community and it is the philosophy of the Social Action Programme and of the Social Chapter. It is also the philosophy of the inward investing Japanese. We can argue that firm labour standards improve efficiency and the quality of relations at work and so create a basis for the regeneration of manufacturing and quality public services.

I believe that we can turn the tide with our belief that the government's craze for flexibility at work means, for many, an ugly, exploited, low paid and unsafe experience. And we can demonstrate that flexibility and vulnerability do not necessarily help job creation or improve competitiveness in manufacturing and services.

The quality of our argument and our campaigning efforts will be crucial.

There is one victory that we desperately need to win. As a result of the new Trade Union Act, one year on from now, unions will have to have secured from up to six million members newly signed check-off forms or have found other ways to collect subscriptions. It will be a massive challenge and, even if we succeed, all we will have done is to retain our existing membership.

But, additionally, it does offer us the opportunity to get the message of trade unionism out to a far wider audience.

Much will depend on unions' local representatives; the shop stewards, the branch secretaries—the activists. Giving our local representatives the confidence and knowledge to become involved intelligently in wider issues is a crucial part of our future.

These, then, are the TUC's priorities as I see them. The TUC itself must change in order to deliver them. How we can change is a matter to which I have already given a great deal of thought. I know that change we must. But I also know that the process of change must be open and collegiate.

It must also be quick. Time is not on our side. And so this autumn we will be involved in an intensive period of consultation with our General Council, with regional councils, with the staff and more broadly. It will lead, I hope, to a relaunching of the TUC early in the New Year, better focused, better able to do a good job for people at work, for our unions and for our country.

Legal attack

Since 1979, the Tory government has passed eight acts of parliament aimed at reducing the power of trade unions

1980 Employment Act

- Picketing restricted to own place of work
- 80 per cent ballot to establish closed shop
- State funds available for union ballots
- Secondary action restricted

1982 Employment Act

- Industrial action must relate to "a trade dispute"
- Secondary action further restricted to "own employer"
- Unions no longer immune from civil action—employers can take out injunctions and sue for damages
- 80 per cent ballot for all closed shops, every five years
- Right not to be dismissed for not being a member of a closed shop
- Removal of union-only labour clauses in commercial contracts

1984 Trade Union Act

- General secretaries, presidents and all executive committee members to be elected by secret ballot every five years
- Ballots on political fund every ten years
- Secret ballots before industrial action

1988 Employment Act

- Members have right to inspect union books
- Right not to be disciplined by the union
- Right to ignore union ballot decisions
- Right to stop check-off
- Unions cannot pay members' fines
- Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members ("Crotum") established

1989 Employment Act

- Restrictions on paid time off for union reps

1990 Employment Act

- Unions liable for unofficial action unless written repudiation sent to all members
- Unofficial strikers can be selectively dismissed
- All secondary action other than picketing unlawful
- Unlawful to refuse to employ non-union member on the basis of closed shop
- Powers of Crotum extended

1992 Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act

- Brings together collective employment rights legislation (individual rights covered by Employment Protection [Consolidation] Act 1978)

1993 Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act

- "Citizen's right" for members of the public to obtain injunctions against unions if they are likely to be deprived of goods and services by unofficial industrial action
- New "Commissioner for Protection against Unlawful Industrial Action" to finance legal action against unions by members of the public
- Unions must give employers seven days written notice of industrial action
- All strike ballots to be postal
- Independent scrutiny of strike ballots
- Postal ballots on union mergers
- Right to join union of choice (undermines "Bridlington" agreement)
- Members must give written authorisation for "check-off" every three years
- New powers for Crotum to check union finances
- "Wilson amendment": lawful for employers to offer incentives for staff to go onto non-union personal contracts

Other employment provisions:

- Protection for employees raising health and safety concerns at work, or leaving hazardous workplace
- Maternity leave increased to 14 weeks, regardless of length of service
- Dismissal on the grounds of pregnancy automatically unfair
- Right to written statement of employment particulars
- Abolition of wages councils
- Amendment of Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations which implement the EC Acquired Rights Directive. In line with EC pressure, the requirement that the undertaking transferred be "in the nature of a commercial venture" has been removed. Also, employees can refuse to transfer to a new employer without incurring dismissal
- Employers must consult with unions on redundancies

Unions stand to lose money and members under new "check-off" rules. Kirsty Milne looks at a looming crisis

Subs headache

Administrative hiccup or financial disaster? The new Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act will make it harder to collect union subscriptions through the "check-off" system.

Under "check-off", an employer deducts subs from workers' pay-packets and hands the money to the union. The system became popular in the 1960s, and now covers three-quarters of all unionised workers. Unions like check-off because it regularises income and stops members falling into arrears. Employers like it because they don't have shop stewards collecting money every week.

But the new law puts a spanner in the works. Unions have a year to ensure that members have given written permission for deductions to be made from their pay. In future, authorisation must be renewed every three years.

Check-off was associated with the old closed shop, and the government's aim was to protect against what employment minister Michael Forsyth described as "abuses" of the system. During the bill's second reading, the Labour peer Lord Stoddart took a different view. "It assumes that employees are cretins who do not keep track of their deductions," he said. Ministers, he suggested, are "relying on inertia on the part of trade union members who will not renew their authorisation, thereby reducing the membership of trade unions and further undermining their power".

For John Monks, the TUC's next general secretary, the new check-off arrangements are both a major headache and a major challenge: "Six million people have got to be visited, talked to, and, in a sense, re-sold the union. In some ways, it's probably a good thing, in that it renews dialogue between unions and their members. But the logistics are very considerable."

The new arrangements will be irksome for employers, too. If the union increases subscription rates, management must give staff a month's notice—and remind them of their right to withdraw from check-off whenever they wish. Employers' groups lobbied against the new rules, forcing the government to drop its original plan for annual re-authorisation. "We are anxious not to see an additional burden on the shoulders of business," says a spokesman for the CBI, which intends to keep an eye on how the new law works in practice. Unions fear that some employers will decide the system is more trouble than it's worth, and abandon check-off altogether.

The TUC has set up a special unit to help unions plan for the problems ahead. In a big workplace, there could be someone whose authorisation expires almost every pay day. How will members give authorisation? Will there be standard forms? Who will design them, distribute them, and monitor returns?

A recent Fabian pamphlet (by Philip Bassett and Alan Cave) forecasts a 15 to 20 per cent membership drop as a result of the new law. Yet individual unions are relaxed, even complacent, about the changes. None will admit to major worries about vanishing members and evaporating income. "We can live with it," says a spokesman for Transport and General Workers' Union, 85 per cent of whose 1.1 million members pay their subs through check-off. "We deplore the partisan interference in union affairs, but we are quite sanguine about being able to comply." The shopworkers' union Usdaw (90 per cent) describes the task as "daunting", but has found big retailers cooperative and is confident of getting authorisations in the workplace.

A note of caution comes from the GMB (92 per cent), which sees check-off as just one element in the hard slog of selling the union to part-timers and young people. "You can't simply say to a 16-year-old, 'OK, we're the union, sign this form for the next three years,'" says a spokesman. "You've got to give them reasons for signing."

The new law highlights what opponents of check-off have always argued: that the system leaves unions vulnerable, giving management an easy weapon to brandish in disputes. British Coal stopped collecting payments for the National Union of Mineworkers after the NUM's day of action in April. In July, the railways dispute prompted British Rail to withdraw check-off from 68,000 RMT members, who account for more than half the union's income. "They've cost us a fortune in lost revenue," says a British Rail spokesman. "Why should we be helping them?"

The breakdown of such longstanding agreements, coinciding with the new law, is prompting efforts to collect subscriptions by other methods. August's Labour Research survey of 18 major unions found a small but general shift towards direct debit payments, which covered 4.8 per cent of members in 1991 and 8 per cent this year. A few unions—such as the teachers' union NAS/UWT and the Prison Officers Association—have nearly all their members paying by direct debit.

Of course, not all lower-paid workers have bank accounts, and some people dislike the idea of direct debit altogether. But the new law does not give the unions much choice. It could even, in the long term, have an unintentionally positive effect.

Union leaders have been talking about the need to develop "lifetime unionism". Yet when someone leaves a job, their check-off payments cease. In an unstable labour market, union income would be better protected by a system that transcends job mobility—and can withstand the wheezes of Conservative politicians.

THE LEFT FIGHTS BACK ON ECONOMIC POLICY

Elections are won and lost on economic issues. Yet policy ideas and debate have been sorely missing from the left scene during the Tory years.

New Economy, the new economic policy journal from the IPPR, aims to recapture the ground vacated by the failure of free market economics, challenge the domination of debate by City economists and build confidence in alternative approaches to economic management.

New Economy is accessible to economists and non-economists alike. Covering all aspects of economic policy, this new quarterly is essential and exciting reading for all those hoping to make change possible.

Services: Full range of advice and assistance on all work-related problems, free legal advice on any matter, professional or personal. The best range of financial, insurance and related services in the trade union movement.
Further information: The association believes that its members have professional skills which are essential to the revival of British industry, but they are afforded neither the status or salaries which they warrant. The Association has campaigned for many years for the appropriate recognition of professional skills and for change in our educational system to produce the very individuals with such qualifications. The Association was successful in obtaining unprecedented safeguards in our members' pensions, welfare and negotiating rights in the government's legislation relating to the privatisation of the electricity industry.

Campaigning for science

IPMS represents 90,000 members in government departments, public sector bodies and private companies. More than two-thirds of these members work in scientific disciplines on research and development which underpins our national defence, industrial strategy, food production, energy, heritage and environmental conservation. We have campaigned against cuts in funding and other policies which have led to the break up of irreplaceable teams of leading scientists and the abandonment of important long term projects. In October 1993, we will launch a new campaign, focusing on government plans to market test and contract out specialist jobs in the Civil Service and privatise government research establishments. We believe these moves would have very damaging effects on industry and the public which government seeks to serve.

Training and education
The GMB is at the forefront of the trade union movement in the provision of training courses for workplace representatives and branch officers.
The training programme offers representatives a systematic package of courses from introductory and induction courses through to advanced and specialist training. Many of our courses are available locally or within the region and they are often on a paid release basis. Further courses are offered at the Union's National College in Manchester (Tel: 061-867 6788).

Legal assistance
GMB provides legal assistance on employment matters. We recover £40 million a year compensation for members injured at work. We are the only union with a network of regional legal officers. GMB provides representation in industrial tribunals and the higher courts. GMB members also benefit from the TUC's Union Law scheme, under which solicitors give low cost help on non-employment matters.

Social security
Free help for members on queries about pensions, industrial injuries, sickness, unemployment and all other benefits.
Free help if you need to appeal against a DSS decision.

Taxation advice
Free advice on any problem connected with income tax.

Financial services
The union has negotiated a comprehensive range of financial services with Unity Financial Services Ltd which includes mortgages and personal loans at competitive rates of interest, motor and home insurance and our own GMB and Apex Partnership Mastercard credit cards. Contact "freephone" telephone numbers are as follows:

Insurance 0800 393030
Personal Loans 0800 378938
Mortgages, Credit card and financial planning 0800 600600

Motoring
GMB/AA Group membership scheme
GMB members are entitled to reduced rates for AA membership. This exclusive scheme is available to both existing AA members and those joining the AA for the first time. For details and an application form, telephone 0272 251519.

Travel
The GMB Holiday & Travel Club offers members a comprehensive travel and holiday booking service. Expert advice and very attractive discounts are available to members from their ABTA and LATA registered travel outlet. Phone 0272 478000 (Mon-Sat 9am - 5.30pm).

Health and safety / Pensions
The union's record in the fields of occupational pensions and health and safety are second to none. We have experts ready to advise and negotiate in establishments where we have members.

Retired members
For retired members, there is a Retired Members and Spouses Association which has branches all over the country. Members who wish to join the association should contact Mrs Doreen Scott, Norman Dodds House, 315 Bexley Road, Erith, DA8 3EX. Tel: 0322 335404.

NATIONAL COMMUNICATIONS UNION

NATIONAL COMMUNICATIONS UNION NCU

AT THE FOREFRONT OF TECHNOLOGY

Wherever NCU members work, they are faced with new technology. Each day they use or help develop new machines and systems which make themselves and others more productive. And how are they rewarded? With the threat of making themselves redundant.

* Last year our BT members increased their productivity by 19% - and 31,800 people left the company on redundancy terms.
* Our post Office members helped make the PO one of the most technologically advanced and profitable in the world - and management threatened us with compulsory redundancies.
* Girobank has become one of the most sophisticated postal banking systems in the world - and management says we are overstaffed.

THE NCU WANT TECHNOLOGY to make working lives simpler, more stimulating, less repetitive. We want imaginative, challenging work for all union members.

BUT IN EXCHANGE we want shorter working hours - as the only way to guard employment, save jobs, enrich lives and eventually prevent social chaos. Shorter working hours are no longer an option. They are a necessity. But it is a fight no union can win alone.

The NCU calls on all unions to MAKE HOURS THE ISSUE.

To mark its 125th anniversary the TUC has produced a 60 page illustrated book charting the history of Britain's national trade union centre, from its origins in Manchester through the turmoil of the 1920s and 1930s, the post war reconstruction and the legislative assaults of the past 14 years. It also looks to the future of trade unionism in Britain. It is titled 'Working for Your Future' and is available, price £5 plus 50p p&p, from TUC Publications.

An audio cassette featuring the voices of trade union leaders past and present is also available (also price £5 plus 75p p&p)

MEDICAL & SCIENTIFIC AID FOR VIETNAM LAOS & CAMBODIA

Ever since 1965, when bombs were raining down on Vietnam, MSAVLC has been sending medicines and medical equipment to help to alleviate the people's suffering.

The war ended in 1975 but its effects go on. Bombs no longer fall from the sky but every day somewhere in Vietnam children or adults step on bombs or anti-personnel mines left over from the war.

MSAVLC'S JAIPUR LIMB PROJECT will help some of Vietnam's 200,000 amputees

Further details - of the limb project and our other work - from the Hon. Secretary, Dr Madeleine Sharp, 49 Baginton Road, Coventry CV3 6TX (Tel/Fax: 0203 414512) to whom donations may be sent. (Cheques payable to MSAVLC).

Further information: Unison is Britain's largest and newest union - formed on 1 July 1993 from a merger between NUPE, COHSE, and NALGO - and organising thoughout the public services and the essential industries. It has 1.4 million members, over two thirds of them women. It has a strong commitment to equal opportunities, both within the union and in the workplace. Unison will pursue a vigorous policy of defending all our public services and the jobs and conditions of all its members both in the public services and the essential industries.
Sections: Local Government (860,000), Health (455,000), Gas (31,000), Electricity (31,000), Water and Transport (26,000 and 5,000 respectively), Higher Education (39,000) is fighting to defend Britain's public services and the jobs and conditions of our members working in them.

Britain's biggest union, organises throughout the public services and essential industries.

has more than 1.4 million members, over two-thirds of them women. And that is one good reason why UNISON is putting women's issues in the forefront of its campaigns, whether for equal rights, for an end to the scandal of low pay or in combatting sexual harassment at work.

is campaigning for higher standards of health and safety, better working conditions, a shorter working week and salaries on a par with those won by our fellow unions in Europe.

Official booksellers to Congress '93, Brighton

We'll come to you...

•Bookmarks provides full bookstalls to union conferences, day schools, courses and many other events.
•We have supplied stalls to many major union conferences this year—from Perth to Bournemouth
•We stock a full range of titles, covering current affairs, history, health and safety, women's liberation, black politics, kids, fiction and much more

Or you can come to us...

for a full range of services:
•Trade Union Book Service, with discounts for union branches
•A complete mail order service—we can get you any book in print
•The Bookmarks Club: a cut-price selection of 8 of the best books each quarter

'Bookmarks... provide an excellent service. I would recommend them for trade union events.'
